Mr. Quillet did not complete his sentence, for that minute a tall, dark man walked calmly into the room, and after bowing to the astonished owner of the house with the blandest and most self-possessed of smiles, sald suavely: "Pray, sir. to what am I indebted for the honor of this call?" demanded Mr. Quillet, glaring at the stranger through his eye-

"Permit me to explain," said the other. with a smile and a bow,

"Weil, it is of no great moment," said the other. "Let me put it to you in this way: You are writing, or have writtenit does not matter which—a tragedy for production at the Erectheum. It may be a strong tragedy, it may be a weak one. But, whatever its quality, I can put into your hands an original work of my own, com-ared with which yours, sir, will read as

And I venture o assert that it is one of the most power ful tragedies that have ever been written in the English tongue," "Ah, well," he said, "you wish me to read your play, I gather? I am very busy and cannot attend to, it now, but if you will leave your manuscript here, together with your name and address, I shall be pleased to giance through it at my leisure and return it to you with my opinion

The stranger smiled knowingly and shook

The latter's patience was utterly broken down by the cool impertinence of the de-"We have had enough of this, sir," said Mr. Quillet, witheringly. "I must wish you good day. There is the door." The stranger drew himself up to his full height, his tall, powerful frame quite

Mr. Quillet, be reasonable I offer you a compromise. Listen while I read the first act, (it is very short), and if at the end you really wish to hear no more, I'll take up my papers and leave the house without another word."

Glaring at the bold intruder with scatt ing glances of impotent wrath, Mr. Quillet sank back in his armchair. He could have sur-moned assistance by bouting out, but he was deterred from this by two considerations-first, that the stranger looked every inch the man to resort o personal violence; second, that it would rave made himself appear in a rather ridio ulouslight. No; the safer as well as themore dignified course was to remain quiet for the present, and to give him in charge the coment he left the house. On that course

Mr. Quillet most firmly resolved. The stranger untolded his roll of manucript and began to read, taking no notice | day, August 20, 1895.

"Shall I leave off here?" inquired the stranger, "or shall I go on? I am ready, you know, to stand by our compact." "Go on, go on," said Mr. Quillet, with a wave of his hand. Every trace of angerand resentment had left him. It was evident from the expression of his face and from his whole decreanor that he was alive to no other sensations than those produced by this extraordinary play.

this extraordinary play.

With kindling eye and heightening color, the stranger proceeded, his deep, musical voice never missing a point nor sturring light and shade. The motif of the tragedy—to wit, the representation of the devil in a human shape—was obviously far from original, but the treatment of the subject was absolutely so, differing both in details and essentials—and differing for the better—from every previous conception. It breathed throughout an air, nos merely of powerful tragic interest, but of genuine reality and natural consequence, which hurried you forward to the fatal climax by a series of irresistible developments. Long eries of irresistible developments. Long before the end was reached Mr. Quillet. who, was far from predisposed in the stran-ger's favor, saw that the piece would be a fortune to any manager and inwardly con-fessed that his own just completed tragedy, on which hitherto he had rather valued himself, would be literally extinguished by the blaze of so powerful a production.

But the wonderful strength and terrible pathos of the denouement soon obliterated from the mind everything in the shape of sordid calculations, and left him only conscious of an overwhelming sense of tragical emotion.

"There," said the stranger, laying down his papers and regarding Mr. Quillet's ex-pressive face with a look of placid triumph. "What did you say? Does the piece justify the strong measures I have taken to force it on your notice, or does it not? Speak,

"it—it's a masterpiece," gasped Mr. Quillet. "A work of genius. A splendid tragedy. There is no man living, and very few dead who could have written it." "I believe you," was the quiet reply, "It stands alone. I know it. And now I give you your reward for having heard me name upon it, and produce it at the Erec-theum for your own." "Er-er-i don't understand you," Mr. Quillet ejaculated, supposing that his ears

"My words were plain," replied the stranger. "My meaning equally so. I make you a present of the piece—out and out—with no reserve, except that you offer it to Bill-hurst, of the Erectheum, in lieu of the one which you are now writing."

"Impossible" cried Mr. Quillet. "Com-mon honesty forbids me to appropriate your work like that Why, man alive, do you not realize that this tragedy is worth money "Bah!" langhed the other scornfully.
"What do I want with either? I have long enjoyed too much of both. All I desire is to have my tragedy produced; in whose name or to whose profit I care not a straw!" "But, really," objected Mr. Quillet,

"Pish, my friend none of these buts. With my eyes open and in good faith I make you an offer which, while it suits me, is highly advantageous to yourself. If you are too proud to accept—well, there may be others less squeamish. But you have your chance!"

"Pride is not concerned in the matter," replied Mr. Quillet. "But how can I bring myself to put my name to another man's work? It would be a species of literary forgery." "Nothing of the sort," was the energetic reply. "The play is my own in every sense, I have an incontestable right to make it

An Assault With a Wooden Leg Is a

on and Carpenter, of Wheatland, paid a visit this morning to Slocum, of the Supreme Court. Mr. Dickinson assaulted Mr. Carpenter with his wooden leg, and the question for decision was whether such assault came under the head of an assault with a deadly weapon or with the kick of the foot. The disputant wagered the sum of $5 on the result.

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Slocum, "my mind is made up. After consulting numer-ous authorities I have come to the following decision. It appears there being no direct evidence to the contrary that the assault was committed with a leg; the fact that it was a wooden one need not enter into the discussion at all I find, therefore, that Mr. Dickinson is entitled to the stakes, and take pleasure in handing them to him
